Salon Art + Design is celebrating its 10th year with a return to the Park Avenue Armory in Manhattan at its usual time in the fall.

The fair, which is produced by Sanford L. Smith + Associates and runs from Nov. 11-15, features a range of material “from the beginning of the 20th century to yesterday,” says Jill Bokor, executive director.

The goal of the fair’s exhibiting galleries is to create “immersive” booths that blend objects the dealers work with into inviting environments, rather than putting things on pedestals, she says.

Bokor views this 10th year of Salon as a “double celebration,” because “a lot of fairs don’t last for 10 years,” and because it’s actually taking place in person with 46 galleries in attendance, including 10 from outside the U.S. The fair typically has around 55 gallery booths, but several international dealers couldn’t commit in time because of fluctuating travel restrictions amid the pandemic.

The galleries that have confirmed were busy with customers through the summer, Bokor says, which means they are bringing a lot of new inventory. And despite the slightly smaller roster of dealers the fair is able to showcase its usual array of design and art categories, from furniture, to ceramics, art, and lighting, she says.

Among the special installations is the debut of Studio Greytak of Montana's immersive installation of furniture and objects that incorporate stones and minerals. John Greytak has "created some amazing pieces including nesting tables with stalactites," Bokor says.
